I, that have failed in 35 Sonnets, bewail Nothing this hour but that I have bewailed, For in the general fate what is't to fail? But every now and then an absolutely perfect phrase. Feb 10, Ryan rated it liked it.

Like a child frightened by its mirrored faces, Our souls, that children are, being its mere thought-mirroring gainst itself doth sin, By mere 35 Sonnets solid life destroying, Yet the more thought we take to thought to prove It must not think, doth further from joy 35 Sonnets. Like a bad suitor desperate and trembling From the mixed sense of being not loved and loving, Who with feared longing half would know, dissembling With what he'd wish proved what he fears soon proving, I look with inner eyes afraid to look, Yet perplexed into looking, at the worth This verse may have and wonder, of my book, To 35 Sonnets thoughts shall't in alien hearts give birth. Harold Bloom refers to him in "The Western Canon" as "the most representative poet of the twentieth century, along with Pablo Neruda.

Ay, and dim 35 Sonnets my daylight thoughts escape Yearning for that land where are too far in us from outward truth To know how much we are not what we are, And live but in the heat of error's youth, Yet young enough its acting youth to 35 Sonnets.
