Every one who is born with propensities to love and wonder too strong and deep to be worn off by repetition or continuance, – in other words, who is born to be always young, – is born a poet. So strong was this preference, that Ogilby, the Scotch fabulist, who had written a collection of fables in English verse, reduced them to prose on the occasion of publishing a more splendid edition in

The copies which he used are said to bear his manuscript notes on almost every page, and these notes are the maxims which are to be found in his fables. Again, To sell the product of her pain Is not degrading to the Muse. In all these instances, we see that fable was a mere auxiliary of discourse – an implement of the orator.
