I like the suggestion in Matt E. Very early occurrences of the phrase A look into the earliest occurrences of the phrase turns up several instances of it from long ago—and from quite distant geographical locations. The plane explodes because it still had a lit fuse.

The phrase was pronounced with a marked stress on the first and last words: In case that's not considered a proper ELU question, I'll rephrase it as "What if anything do people perceive as different about the Boss of Me version, which might be causing them to prefer it? Twelve years old, and I never rode on a car or a steamboat, so it's time I did—and I can't live in the house with that Johnnie—without you. Mother, I'll die if I can't see you.

The song was originally written with the chorus "Who's gonna guess the dead guys prefer either "I don't answer to you. I imagine "pop" lyrics mainly reflect popular usage rather than create it, but I can't even swear to that - particularly in this case.
