In modern societies such resources are largely allocated and used within the structuring constraints of the capitalist and Modernity: Arguments about the Media and Social Theory of production. In short, the study of the exercise of economic power is a classic field for the study of social theory's central problem, the relation between structure and agency. I argue that the operation and control by specialists of the systems of social communication, and thus the social distance and distinction between those who produce symbolic forms and those who consume or appropriate them, are an inevitable corollary of the general process of specialization that characterizes modernity.
